ABSTRACT

This directory lists World Bank depository libraries that have agreed to work with the World Bank as active partners in the dissemination of Bank materials by promoting their use among the libraries' different groups of readers. Entries are organized alphabetically by the depository library's country and city, and the entries typically include the name of the organization, street and mailing address, postal code, telephone number (country code and city code), facsimile and telex numbers, cable address, the director of the institution, name and title of contact person, and the date the library was appointed as a depository. The directory concludes with the World Bank Depository Library program's selection criteria, an application for designation as a World Bank depository library, and the names and addresses of distributors of World Bank publications. Introduction

The World Bank's Depository Library Program is one of the key elements in its publications strategy. As the world's largest development institution, the World Bank undertakes large projects of research, analysis, and data gathering. The dissemination of that research is a necessary part of the Bank's objectives, because knowledge and information, to have value, must be shared. Well-organized libraries that serve numerous users are one of the most effective channels for the sharing of knowledge and information. For that reason, the World Bank sets great store by its relationship with its depositories and encourages their activities in every practicable way.

The libraries listed in this directory have all agreed to work with the World Bank as active partners in the dissemination of Bank materials by promoting them and encouraging their use among their different groups of readers.

Any library may apply to join the program. The number of participants is necessarily limited, and in general not more than one participant is accepted in any one city, except for the densely populated metropolises. To ensure equitable distribution of participants between countries and regions, and to prevent any one country from obtaining a disproportionate share of the available resources for the program, some quota limitations apply.

The World Bank Depository Library Program

Selection Criteria

Objective To provide free public access in member countries to the World Bank's published information.

Scope Each member country is entitled to one depository library. Additional depositories may be designated in developing countries. Depositories will not be authorized in non-member countries. U.N. or affiliate agencies or offices of the World Bank are not eligible.

Selection Interested organizations must complete an application for designation as a Bank depository library. Seven basic criteria must be satisfied:

Location. Generally no more than one library is designated in any one city.

Facilities. Participants must have a public reading room and adequate space to shelve and maintain some 300 new publications a year.

Staff. At least one trained librarian must be responsible for implementing the organization's agreement with the Bank, or be in charge of the World Bank publications collection.

Systems. Participants must be able to place and maintain Bank publications under bibliographic control.

Accessibility. The institution must be open to the public during normal business hours. It is expected that use of the library will be without charge.

Library users. Evidence must be shown of the types and the number of individual and institutional clients served by the applicant. In general, libraries attached to institutes devoted to a specific subdiscipline of development will not be chosen. Libraries whose users are interested in all or most of the subjects in which the World Bank publishes will be preferred.

Outreach activity. An accessions or current acquisitions list should be circulated regularly to the library's clients.

Implementation

A formal memorandum of agreement between the Bank and the depository library sets out the activities to be undertaken by both organizations and their responsibilities. The agreement is renewable bi-annually on receipt of annual reports to the Bank on the participant's activities.
